Over five years ago (from the series-ending in 1991), ruthless but irresistible J.R. Ewing lost his vast family business, Ewing Oil, to his archenemy Cliff Barnes. Distraught and humiliated, J.R., confronted the devil himself and fired one shot from his gun. Now, we learn that J.R. did not commit suicide. He's very much alive and planning his return to power.

J.R.'s younger brother, the decent Bobby Ewing, has a loving relationship with his own 18-year-old son, Christopher, who has inherited Bobby's honesty. Bobby's lonely, of course, since the death of his beloved wife, April, and his loneliness is amplified by the emptiness of Southfork, the massive ranch that used to be filled with the tumultuous Ewing family

Dallas: War of the Ewings" begins with a scene of Bobby Ewing in the shower. He turns around and says 'Good morning'. The same scene from thirteen years ago, when Pam woke up from her "dream". Sue Ellen Ewing steps into the shower with him and gives him a kiss... it's then turns out, that it's actually J.R. Ewing's bad dream. Sue Ellen comes in to his room and wakes him up, reminding him that they're planning to have lunch.

J.R. reads the morning paper at breakfast, seeing that his company, Weststar Oil, is rated the number 1 independent oil company in Texas. Ewing Oil, now owned by Bobby and Sue Ellen, is second.

J.R. asks his banker to get him a loan, so he can plan a hostile takeover of Ewing Oil. He's told that his net worth won't cover such a large amount. Anita Smithfield, J.R.'s lawyer and lover comes over and J.R. tells her he's tired of making offers to get Ewing Oil back - he plans on splitting Bobby and Sue Ellen up in a 'divide and conquer' setup. He also tells her that he has discovered geological reports that indicate there's oil under Ray Krebbs' ranch, which J.R. intends to use as collateral for his loan.
